DESCRIPTION

It's easy to think that our faith is personal, something which should be expressed behind closed doors or with other Christians. But the world needs to hear the gospel, and there are a whole host of ways we can publicly proclaim our faith. From identifying the key battle lines where there is friction between Christianity and modern Western society, to engaging with mainstream media; from street preaching to an evangelistic online presence, Nicholls exhorts Christians to be salt and light wherever God gives them opportunities.

MARKETING POINTS

How to explain faith publicly

AUTHOR

Graham Nicholls is Director of Affinity, an organisation seeking to promote Christian unity and partnership throughout the British Isles. Graham provides strategic leadership of the ministry teams, and he regularly writes and speaks in the media. He is also one of the Pastors of Christ Church Haywards Heath and preaches there regularly. He is married to Caroline and has three grown up children.

ENDORSEMENTS

From wisdom on answering common objections to Christianity, to engaging the media and being salt and light online and in politics, this is an excellent call for Christians to combine truth and grace as we take the glorious gospel beyond just our own circles and into the public square. You'll find this book clear, compelling and creative.

Director of Communications and Engagement, Care, UK

For many years, I have believed that Christians need to not just respond to what is happening in the public square, but actively get involved in the conversation. I'm grateful to Graham for sharing some helpful ideas and tips to help us start that journey, especially if this is new to us. This book provides an honest assessment of the landscape, speaking into the challenges we face but more importantly the many opportunities ahead to witness to Christ. I pray this book will help you, whether as a church leader or just a Christian to consider stepping up in making your voice heard in the public square.
