DESCRIPTION

The quest for eternal life intersects with theological debates on grace, works, and human nature.
While medieval and Roman Catholic traditions suggested that merit was earned through works, the Reformation tradition emphasized salvation by grace alone, due to humanity's corruption by sin. Perkins examines historical, biblical, and systematic theology to argue for Adam's original righteousness, emphasizing the sufficiency of Christ's merits over human effort, and reinforces the law–gospel distinction and the significance of grace.

ENDORSEMENTS

Perkins' volume showcases God's wisdom, goodness, and grace in his works of creation and redemption, as well as our high human calling—from the beginning and finally realized in Christ. This book will enrich and bless its readers.

David VanDrunen
Robert B. Strimple Professor of Systematic Theology and Christian Ethics, Westminster Seminary in California, Escondido, California

The value of this book is found in its close engagement with primary and secondary sources arguing in favor of and alongside the Reformed confessional heritage since the sixteenth century on such topics as the covenant of works and the covenant of grace .... It is worth our time as pastors, theologians, and students to engage with this book and its concepts.

Todd Rester
Associate Professor of Church History, Westminster Theological Seminary, Philadelphia

This is a deep and detailed study of God's covenantal relationship and promise to Adam, rich in exegetical, historical, and doctrinal insights and pastoral reflections. Fruitful reading for anyone interested in this fascinating topic!

... Harrison Perkins tackles some difficult and nuanced questions over law and gospel, merit and mercy, and nature and grace. ... Particularly, his painstaking attention to nuances in medieval views on righteousness and merit, with their lasting implications, represents ground rarely covered by Reformed Protestants.
