DESCRIPTION

Timothy A. Gatewood offers a profound exploration of the relationship between God and truth, rooted in Thomistic theology and classical theism. He presents a participatory theory of truth, emphasizing that all creaturely truth originates from and participates in the First Truth—God Himself. By retrieving and adapting Thomas Aquinas's doctrine of the divine intellect, Gatewood challenges modern and postmodern philosophical assumptions, advocating for a return to classical theological frameworks to rediscover objective, knowable truth. The book defends classical doctrines such as divine simplicity, immutability, and aseity, while engaging with alternative models of theism.

- Part of the Reformed Exegetical Doctrinal Studies series edited by J.V. Fesko and Matthew Barrett
- Traces development of Reformed Thomism
- Pastoral application, as well as philosophical concepts

Perfect for theologians, philosophers, and seekers of truth, it bridges historical insights with contemporary discourse, enriching the understanding of God, truth, and creation. With pastoral applications, it encourages personal growth and alignment with divine reality, offering hope and clarity in a fragmented world. Ideal for anyone seeking to rediscover the joy of knowing and participating in divine truth, goodness, and beauty.

AUTHOR

Timothy Gatewood is the Director of Spiritual Formation at Hartfield Academy in Flowood, Mississippi. He serves Midwestern Baptist Theological Seminary as an adjunct professor of theology and is an elder candidate at Grace City Church in Jackson. He and his wife, Beth, have three sons.

ENDORSEMENTS

...A serious addition to the library being written by an elite cadre of evangelical theologians who recognize the classical tradition... If you have even the slightest interest in the truth, you will acquire and consume Gatewood's book.

Malcolm B. Yarnell III
Research Professor of Theology, Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary, Fort Worth, Texas

Well written, incisive, and nuanced in its judgements, Gatewood's book masterfully fills a gap in contemporary theological scholarship by reminding us of the importance of the classical doctrine of God for defining Truth and grounding epistemology.

Christopher Holmes
Professor of Systematic Theology, University of Otago, Dunedin, New Zealand

Dr. Timothy Gatewood's work addresses two problems found at the crossroads of theology proper and epistemology... It offers a clear and cogent defense that serves the larger agenda of theological retrieval.

Thor Madsen
Professor of New Testament, Ethics and Philosophy, Midwestern Baptist Theological Seminary, Kansas City, Missouri

A Protestant retrieval of Thomism may be just what a secular world needs to save it from skepticism and relativism. If you think that is crazy, read this book and think again.

Craig Carter
Craig Carter, Theologian in Residence, Westney Heights Baptist Church, Ajax, Ontario
